When I sallied forth from my room this morning, I ran into Dmitri, and his step-son Tony Rosslyn. Mac Toon came to the club to bring me up to date on what had happened thus far at the Paris meetings. I lunched with Brose and Ginny Chamber at Fouquets, before joining the American delegation at the Embassy.

At 7:00 o'clock I met Dean Rusk at the Embassy residence, and had a talk with him before his two British guests arrived. Lord Home and Sir Evelyn Shuckburgh, the Secretary and myself, dined together. The two Secretaries of State discussed a great many matters.

I went this afternoon to pay a return call on the Egyptian Ambassador, whose office still carries the sign "The United Arab Republic".

Before dinner, Ann Penfield, here for a few days from Iceland, M. and Madame Claude Serruelles (formerly ^{Maria} Helene de Gany), and Lord and Lady John Hope came for drinks.

E and I dined with the Hugh Gaitskells. We had a gay time, everyone staying until after midnight. Dora Gaitskell is an exceptionally good cook. The others there were Diana Cooper, Ian Fleming, the Provost of King's College, Cambridge, and Mrs. Annan, Alastair Forbes, and the Parliamentary Correspondent of the Economist.

In connection with the visit of Bob McNamara and Paul Nitze, who are expected here on December 11, I wrote today to Dean Rusk, asking, if he approves, that a letter from me to Paul Nitze be forwarded to the latter, enclosing a memoranda of questions on US views about UK military policy, which might be useful to Nitze as background. The questions are as follows:
